BALDWIN CO. IS IMPROVING

R. H. Caswell Visits the Place Where He Formerly Lived.

That Baldwin county is fast improving and becoming thickly populated is shown by the following letter from R. H. Caswell, of this city, a former resident of Baldwin county and who recently visited his old home. The letter appeared in the Foley Outlook:

Having returned from a trip in Baldwin county, I will write you a few lines that may interest some of your many readers.

We left Pensacola Sept. 1, by train to Millview. There we met Rufus Walker's combination. We went across the bay near Lillian on the old Shaegon place. We saw a large turpentine still in full blast; we stopped at a number of landings. At each place there were launches of various sizes. The Baldwin shore is dotted with new cottages all along with open stores and a saw mill. I spoke to a fellow passenger about the wonderful changes. He said I ought to see the interior that there were two smart little towns, Foley and Elberta, and the country is being rapidly settled up by industrious people, that the hammer and saw could be heard, and the smoke of clearing could be seen everywhere but still there was room for more.

We landed at Rufus Walker's, went to L. Walker's postmaster at Caswell, which used to be called Bear Point, where we formerly lived before moving to Pensacola nine years ago when, if we went to Millview, it was with a sail skiff. There was then only three stopping places, Ross Point, Josephine postoffice, Foley and Elberta, (Col. Hatches) and Lillian. We saw at L. Walker's a lemon tree with about a dozen lemons on it which would average two pounds each. Walker also had a fine display of flowers.

At G. C. Bills, whose place fronts on the bay, half mile from the Gulf, we saw a fine sight. He has a great variety of fruit trees, peaches, pears, plums, grapes, lemons and oranges. One of the latter had about six hundred nice sweet oranges on it. He also has a fine lot of Japanese cane, some nice syrup, which holds its sweetness indefinitely, sweet potatoes, velvet beans, cabbage, corn, tomatoes, peas and peanuts. Here I saw a copy of the Outlook and was surprised to see such a fine paper in such a new town. I had read clippings from your paper in the Pensacola Journal, but supposed it a little four page, sixteen column affair. I was pleased to see that it is republican in politics, having been born that way nearly seventy years ago, voting for Abraham Lincoln in 1860.

Stories of the Streets and Town

The man who's full of oxygen can do surprising stunts. Let's fill the eager candidates And try it just this once.

"My wife's up in the north with the kids," explained the convivial-looking Pensacola citizen. "I was up with them for a couple of weeks, but that was all I could spare from business."

"Of course," said the man with the scattered and retreating hair, with a jocular wink. "Business has to be attended to, doesn't it? How much longer do you suppose you'll be able to keep her up there?"

"She'll have to come back now so the children can go to school," said the convivial-looking citizen. "I expect her in a day or two. I'll be mighty glad to have her back."

"I know it," said the man with the retreating hair, grinning. "You'll be tied to death, won't you? It's awful lonely sitting in the house by yourself evenings and listening to the clock tick—what? How long have you been in solitude?"

"About two weeks," replied the convivial-looking citizen.

"Dear me!" sighed the man with the retreating hair. "I suppose you're relieved of the pangs of absence mainly by going back to the office and working till 1 or 2 in the morning. I know how it is."

"It's fierce!" said the convivial-looking citizen. "All the same I haven't been doing any late office work. I can generally find enough to do between 8:30 and 5 to satisfy my conscience and take the edge off my energy. No; what I've been needing has been a little evening relaxation of some sort. As you say, it's not very lively sitting alone and listening to the clock tick. There's nothing sadder than staying in the house by one's self."

"Even when you can get a few good fellows to drop in and help you while away the weary hours it isn't like having the gracious presence of a woman in the house, is it?" said the other man.

"It is not," replied the convivial-looking citizen, gravely. "But I haven't had any friends over in the evening. If I had I wouldn't be alone, would I?"

"How true!" said the man with the retreating hair. "Where are you going to whomp it up to-night?"

"At home," replied the convivial-looking citizen. "I eat downtown, of course, but I go home to spend the evening. I generally read and smoke a pipe or two and then toddle to bed. Sometimes when I'm feeling particularly kiddy and reckless I start up the phonograph for a while."

"What are you going to rehearse?" asked the man with the retreating hair.

"I don't understand," said the convivial-looking citizen.

"Is that what you're going to tell your wife? See here, you take my advice and don't try it. You tell it pretty well, but the man who knows you just a little bit by this time, no sense in trying now much you can get her to swallow. There might come a time you'll want her to believe something that's really so."

"I think I catch your meaning at last," said the convivial-looking citizen. "You suppose that I'm taking advantage of my wife's absence to conduct myself in a manner unbecoming a sober, respectable married man. You think that I'm hunting up all the old in a mad whirl of dissipation."

"A little harmless recreation after the cares of the day, I should call it," said the man with the retreating hair. "You've got the idea, all right, though. We'll say 'hitting her up pretty lively' if you prefer it."

"When I want to do that I'll do it when my wife's at home," said the convivial-looking man. "Then she'll know the worst and she won't worry to speak of. I do like a little evening out once in a while, but not while she's away, thank you all the same. What I do then is to catch my regular train to town and get back in time to wrinkle the lawn. I haven't missed an evening since I got back."

"You are a noble character and a pattern to your sex," said the man with the retreating hair. "I would that there were more like you, but I fear you are in a class by yourself."

"Don't you ever think it," said the convivial looking citizen. "I'm not the only fellow that's got observant neighbors."

"There," said Miss Cleveland as she set the wedding present down on the head bookkeeper's desk. Then she stood back a few paces.

"It's worth $50," she said proudly. "We got it for $15. Turn her upside down if you don't believe it. She's got both price marks on her. See what it says: 'Was $50; now $15. Say, that's a peach of a bargain! What? Won't it look perfectly grand in their little old two by four cartage? I tell you they won't have anything else like it when they stand up at their wedding presents in a row.'"

"It's to be hoped that they won't," murmured the shipping clerk as he softly glided from the outskirts of the gazing crowd and disappeared.

There was a movement in the front row as if those most in evidence would gladly have been less conspicuous. Those in the rear took advantage of a moment when Miss Cleveland needed to find a safer place for the work of art, which was flourishing one frisky foot dangerously far out over the edge of the desk, to drift unobtrusively away.

"Well, what do you think of her?" demanded Miss Cleveland. She looked squarely into the face of the timid new stenographer, who tried to back through the crowd, but was prevented from executing this retreat by coming hopelessly in contact with the solid figure of Miss Brown.

"She's real kind of pretty," breathed the new one, faintly. Then as Miss Cleveland still fixed her with a compelling gaze, she continued, "Where did she come from?"

"She's a real Eyseltian marble piece," said Miss Cleveland triumphantly. "They were having a sale at Bruckenecker's and when I saw her sittin' in the window this morning I says to myself, 'That's what we'll get for Miss Smith for her wedding present.' My! I was afraid she'd be gone when I got there. Such a bargain! It's the greatest wonder in the world somebody hadn't took her. Of course, she looks kind of big for a little flat, but then a real artistic piece of bric-a-brac makes any place look stylish."

"Say, where's all the men gone to? I don't believe a one of 'em got a real good look at her. Well, anyway, it don't make much difference what they think. Men ain't got any taste, generally speaking, and if the girls like her—"

"Well, guess yes," said Maggie, the blonde switchboard operator, fervently. She clasped her hands together in rapt admiration. "My! If you'll only give me one like her when I'm married I won't ask for another thing."

"For me," chimed in Miss Fellows. "I think it's just grand. It's just like you say. Any parlor, no matter how little you had in it, would look awful stylish with that there lady sittin' up in front of the window."

Miss Cleveland swelled visibly. "And so cheap," she gloated. "Fifteen dollars, marked down from fifty. Just think of that! Any other time, I'll bet you anything we couldn't have got her for three times the money."

"Of course, she wouldn't be any use to a person," said Miss Fellows, doubtfully, "but then who wants useful wedding presents? I want pretty things, something you don't see every day—something different don't you know. Ain't that the way you feel, Miss Bronson?" She turned to the purchasing agent's stenographer, who stood next her.

The purchasing agent's stenographer was a tall, angular maiden who combed her hair back from her forehead with an energy worthy of a better cause than that which she seemed to have—namely, the obliteration of any personal attraction with which in the mysterious past nature may have endowed her.

At the question she turned quickly toward the speaker and the austere knob on the back of her head brushed the nose of that amiable person so unexpectedly that she sneezed.

"I don't feel any call," she said, "to think anything at all about weddings in general, but as for that thing," she cast a withering glance at the proposed offering, "it ain't decent in the first place, it's perfectly hideous in the second, and it ain't even useful. What on earth she can use it for except a hitching post I don't see, and I don't suppose they'll keep many horses and carriages on a thousand a year."

She glared upon Miss Cleveland for a second. "I don't know," she went on, "as you really wanted to know what I thought, but that's it."

She stalked away to her desk and the group gazed after her speechless, until Miss Cleveland, gathering up the malignant image, which stuck a refractory foot into her admirer's ear, and replacing it in the box, remarked icily:

"And I suppose, I really do suppose," with ineffable contempt, "that that calls itself a lady."

A week or so ago a paper was circulated and signatures asked of democrats, who would be willing to join a club. There were between seventy and eighty willing, and these, with signatures since obtained make a good strong club, and if we mistake not, the only one in Covington county.

Mr. Morgan D. Jones was elected chairman, Mr. Chas. C. McKee, secretary, and Mr. O. R. Smith, treasurer.

The following resolutions were read and adopted and signed by those who joined the club.

Whereas, we believe in the old-fashioned principles of democracy promulgated by Thomas Jefferson and a long line of statesmen, which principles are embodied in the platform adopted by the democratic party in national convention at Denver, and whereas, William Jennings Bryan and John W. Kern stand for those principles, and pledge themselves, I elected, to carry out the said platform.

Whereas, we believe that the good of the country demands that the democratic party be put in power by the election of its candidate;

We, the undersigned, hereby form ourselves into a Bryan and Kern club, for the purpose of aiding in every way we can in the present campaign, and we hereby agree to work individually and collectively to secure the election of the nominees of the democratic party.

Col. S. H. Dent, of Montgomery, was called upon for a speech. Mr. L. H. Brassell followed him with an appeal to all voters to be true to the party and to support Bryan and Kern.

Mr. Morgan D. Jones made a short address in which he strongly urged that each democrat when he found a member of the party straying from the fold that it was his political duty to reason with him and try to reclaim him. Mr. Jones especially urged club work. Mr. K. E. Price, of Troy, was present and by request addressed the newly organized club. He had organized a few Bryan and Kern clubs. Thought Florida democrats should be proud of the auspicious evening of the club. He touched on the favorableness of Democratic success; on the fitness of Bryan as a chief executive, his character as an American citizen, and the great good that could be accomplished by club work. He lambasted the republican party; told in cold figures of the lavish expenditure of the people's money, and in the most sarcastic manner told of the things that the republican party had given us.

Mr. Price is an orator who has the facts and figures at his command and uses them with telling effect.

The chairman called for contributions and the following were made: M. D. Jones $1, J. F. McKee $1, W. E. Hughes $1, B. R. Powell $1, W. J. Hanna $1, J. W. Swilley $1, W. C. Whitt $1, L. H. FLORAL'S BRYAN AND KERN CLUB

State Line Town Has Organized Worthy Campaign Working Body.

Florida, although across the line, is according to The Journal's thinking, really a West Florida town on account of the interchange of business between Pensacola and Florida, and in printing the following from the Florida News The Journal does so to encourage other really West Florida towns to stronger efforts in the organization of democratic campaign clubs.

In answer to a call that had been issued previous to that time urging democrats to come together and organize a Bryan and Kern Club, about fifty democrats came together at the opera house last Tuesday night at eight o'clock and perfected an organization.

A week or so ago a paper was circulated and signatures asked of democrats, who would be willing to join a club. There were between seventy and eighty willing, and these, with signatures since obtained make a good strong club, and if we mistake not, the only one in Covington county.

BARK OLIVARI MOVED AT LAST

Vessel, Which Was Wrecked in 1906, Is Towed Across the Bay.

The Italian bark Olivari, one of the vessels wrecked by the hurricane of Sept. 1906, was moved yesterday from a point near Muscogee wharf, where she was carried by the storm, and towed across the bay, being run aground by the tugboat.

The Olivari is the last of the fleet of foreign vessels wrecked during the storm, to be moved. The tug Allie R. pumped all of the water from the hold, and this so lightened the bark that the Monarch was able to move her.

The Gulf Machine Works owns the vessel and it is the intention to burn her for the metal contained in her construction, of which there is a large quantity.
